THE END

When the vacuum cleaner salesman called at Harry's house, Harry said, "I'm sorry, but my mother isn't here right now."

The vacuum cleaner man started to go away, but Harry said, "Why don't you leave the vacuum cleaner for her to try when she comes home? I'm sure she'd like to buy it."

"You think so, kid?" the vacuum cleaner man said hopefully.

"Sure," Harry said. "This one is lots bigger and brighter than the one we have."

So the man left the vacuum cleaner and said he'd be back after a while to see how Harry's mother liked it.

This gave Harry the chance he had always been looking for. His mother would never let him touch their old one.

Nobody had told Harry not to touch this one, so with great delight he plugged it in the way he had seen his mother do, and started to clean the rug.

"Boy!" he said, "it's got power!"

He tried the suction mouth on the tablecloth. It had power there too. It had so much power it sucked up the end of the tablecloth!

When Harry tried to pull it away, it pulled the tablecloth away—and everything on the table crashed to the floor! The sugar bowl broke and spilled sugar over the carpet. The water pitcher broke and spilled water over the sugar. A few other things like butter and jelly spilled too. There was quite a mess.

"Boy!" Harry said to himself, "it's a good thing I've got this nice strong vacuum cleaner. I'll clean this mess up fast." So he turned the vacuum cleaner on the mess.

He worked happily for about a minute. Harry liked to help people. The bigger the job the better he liked it. This was a big job. It made him very happy.

But not for long!

The vacuum cleaner didn't seem to be working so well now. It had cleaned up some of the mess, but it had rubbed the rest of it all over the floor everywhere. Harry stopped to think.

"Maybe," he thought, "some of this wet sugar and butter and peanut butter and jelly and stuff is gumming up the works. I'd better clean out the vacuum cleaner."

So he broke the electrical connection at the wall switch, the way he had seen his mother do, and took the cleaner all apart. He could see right away that it was a hopeless job to try to clean it. Then he had a brilliant idea.

"I'll make it blow itself clean!" he said, happily.

So he put it together again. But he reversed the blower, so that instead of sucking air in, it would blow it out.

He turned on the switch, and his idea worked fine. Sugar, peanut butter, jelly, corn flakes and all that stuff, blew out in gobs. The only trouble was, it blew all over the room. It also blew all over Harry's mother and the vacuum cleaner man who entered the door at that moment.

"Harry, my house!" his mother screamed.

"My vacuum cleaner!" the vacuum cleaner man screamed.

"I was only dusting the house," Harry started to explain.

"The thing that needs dusting the most in this house, is you, young man," his mother said, "and it is no job for a vacuum cleaner." She applied her hand in an old-fashioned dusting job.
